Excerpt: . . . is there anything in the relations of the parties or in the events as they occurred, which could have given Mrs. Weaver the right to believe that he would stand by his signature on this note If you find that there are no circumstances in the case warranting any such belief on her part, that is proper for you to consider when you make up your minds whether she had any such belief or not. Peoples beliefs are ordinarily founded on some basis. People that are sane and come to their conclusion by the ordinary processes of reasoning have some ground, or color of ground, for their beliefs, ordinarily. Now is there anything in this case which naturally would have given Mrs. Weaver the right to expect that Martin Davis would say, when he was informed she had put his name on the note, would say that it was right, that it was proper Is there anything in the case which would warrant her in any such expectation That is what you are to consider in connection with her statement that she thought he would ratify or sanction the use of his name. We regard this as an admirably clear and lucid statement of the correct proposition of law applicable to the case. It is strictly within the rule stated in the case of People v. Stevens (109 N. Y. 159), that where the intent is a material element of the offense belief must...
